SALT LAKE CITY — About 130 Summit County residents received mail-in election ballots containing return envelopes addressed to San Juan County.

Summit County officials say the error appears to have occurred at the printing office. The ballots themselves are correct, according to the county.

Voters who received the incorrect envelopes should fill out the ballot, sign the envelope and cross out San Juan County and write Summit County. The ballot should be dropped off at Summit County ballot box or at the county clerk's office at the courthouse in Coalville, according to county officials. San Juan County is aware of the problem and will forward any ballots that were mailed there and Summit County will still count them.

San Juan County is also at the heart of concerns over voting rights for Navajos. The U.S. Justice Department is sending a monitor to watch polls in a southeastern Utah county where Navajo voters form a slim majority, the Associated Press reported.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Utah and the state elections office have also pledged to send officials to the county to observe.
